Alone and Lost

Victor Frankenstein had always been a curious and intelligent boy. As he grew older, he spent more and more time alone, reading books about science and discovery. When he went to university, his obsession with creating life took over. He worked in secret, cutting himself off from friends and family. The more he isolated himself, the more reckless he became.

When Victor finally brought his creation to life, he was horrified by what he had done. He ran away, leaving the creature to fend for itself. Instead of facing his actions, he hid from the world, making himself even more alone. But Victor was not the only one suffering from isolation—his creature was completely alone too.

The creature had no one to guide him. He wandered through forests and villages, watching people from a distance. He wanted to belong, but every time he tried to approach someone, they screamed and ran away. He learned to speak by secretly listening to a kind family in a small cottage. But when he finally showed himself, they rejected him out of fear. Heartbroken and angry, the creature realized he would always be alone.

Both Victor and the creature suffered from their isolation. Victor's loneliness made him reckless and selfish. The creature's loneliness made him angry and desperate. When they finally met again, the creature asked Victor why he had created him only to leave him alone. Victor had no answer. In the end, they both suffered because they had no one to turn to.

Was it their fate to be alone, or was there another path they could have taken?
