Nature's Gift

Miss Rumphius had always loved nature. As a child, she would run through grassy fields, collect seashells along the shore, and marvel at the colors of the sunset. Her grandfather, who shared her love for the natural world, often told her stories about the beauty of different places. He encouraged her to explore the world and to find a way to make it more beautiful.

As she grew older, Miss Rumphius carried this love for nature with her wherever she went. She traveled to distant lands, climbed high mountains, and walked through vast deserts. She admired the lush forests, the deep blue oceans, and the bright flowers that bloomed in faraway places. No matter where she went, nature filled her with wonder and inspiration.

Eventually, Miss Rumphius settled in a quiet house by the sea. She loved the sound of the waves and the way the wind rustled the tall grass. But she remembered her grandfather's words—she had not yet found a way to make the world more beautiful. One spring, as she looked at a small patch of purple lupine flowers near her home, an idea blossomed in her heart.

She began to gather lupine seeds and scattered them along roadsides, in empty fields, and on hillsides. As the years passed, the flowers spread, filling the land with brilliant shades of blue, pink, and purple. People in the town noticed the transformation and asked where the flowers had come from. When they learned it was Miss Rumphius who had planted them, they were inspired by her love for nature and her simple act of kindness.

Because of her, people started planting their own flowers and trees. They began to see the value in caring for the environment and adding beauty to the world. Miss Rumphius had found her way to give back, guided by her deep love for nature. Even after she grew old, the flowers continued to bloom, reminding people that small actions can leave a lasting impact.
