Farmer's Market Fun

Every Saturday, Lily and her family sold fresh produce at the farmer's market. They had a stall filled with vegetables, fruits, and homemade jams. Lily loved helping her parents arrange the display. She made sure the strawberries and raspberries looked inviting, while her dad arranged the crates of wrinkled potatoes.

One day, her friend Walter came by to visit. He was amazed by the variety of food. "This is incredible, Lily!" he said, picking up a jar of apple jam. Lily smiled and offered him a taste. Walter's eyes widened as he tasted the sweet, tangy flavor.

A customer approached their stall and asked about the sweet corn. Lily's mom explained how they grew it on their family farm. The customer bought a dozen ears and a jar of honey. As the day went on, more people visited their stall. Some were interested in the homemade pickles, while others wanted to know about the knobbly carrots.

Lily loved the bustling atmosphere of the market. She heard the sound of children laughing and vendors calling out their prices. A wren perched on their stall's wooden sign, chirping cheerfully. By midday, they had sold almost all of their produce.

As the market was winding down, Lily noticed a little girl looking at the last of their raspberries. She offered the girl a handful for free. The girl's face lit up, and she thanked Lily with a big smile.

At the end of the day, Lily and her family packed up the remaining items. They were tired but happy. Selling food at the farmer's market was hard work, but it was also a lot of fun. Lily couldn't wait to come back next Saturday.
