Created Alone

Victor Frankenstein was a brilliant scientist, but he made a terrible mistake. In his desire to create life, he built a creature from different body parts and brought it to life using the power of lightning. At first, he was amazed at what he had done, but when the creature opened its eyes, Victor was filled with fear. Instead of caring for his creation, he abandoned it.

The creature was left alone, confused, and frightened. He had no name, no home, and no one to guide him. He wandered through the wilderness, trying to understand the world. He watched people from a distance, learning how they spoke and acted. He wanted to be loved, but whenever he tried to approach someone, they ran away in fear. He soon realized that no one would accept him because of how he looked.

Victor never thought about what would happen to the creature after bringing it to life. He had acted without considering the consequences. The creature suffered because his creator refused to take responsibility. Feeling rejected and angry, the creature searched for Victor. When they finally met again, the creature asked, "Why did you create me if you were only going to leave me alone?"

Victor had no good answer. He was afraid of his creation, but he had also failed to care for it. The novel suggests that creators have responsibilities toward what they bring into the world. If Victor had treated the creature with kindness and taught him how to live, things might have been different. Instead, his neglect led to sadness, anger, and destruction.

Through Victor's story, Mary Shelley teaches an important lesson: when we create something, we must take responsibility for it.
