Creator and Creation

Victor Frankenstein and his creature may seem very different, but they actually share many similarities. Both of them struggle with loneliness, both are highly intelligent, and both feel great pain because of their choices and experiences. However, their differences make them enemies instead of friends.

Victor was born into a wealthy family in Geneva. He was loved and cared for, with every opportunity to learn and grow. He became fascinated with science and eventually discovered a way to create life. But when he brought his creature to life, he was horrified by its appearance. Instead of taking responsibility, he ran away, leaving the creature alone and afraid.

The creature, on the other hand, was not born into a loving home. He was abandoned from the start. He had to teach himself everything—how to speak, how to read, and how to survive. Even though he was kind at first, people feared him because of the way he looked. No matter how hard he tried to connect with others, he was always rejected. Over time, his loneliness turned into anger.

Both Victor and the creature experienced deep loneliness, but they handled it differently. Victor chose to isolate himself, focusing only on his work. The creature, however, wanted love and friendship but was denied it. In the end, their pain brought them together, not as father and son, but as enemies. The creature wanted revenge for the suffering Victor had caused him, while Victor wanted to stop the creature from hurting others.

The novel shows that Victor and his creature are more alike than they realize. They are both alone, misunderstood, and filled with pain. If Victor had cared for his creation instead of abandoning it, things might have ended differently.
