More Mouse Mischief

If you take a mouse to school, you know he'll want to do everything a student does. But what happens when the school day isn't over yet? Well, the mouse will probably want to keep going—there's still so much to explore!

After remembering his backpack, the mouse decides that he needs to visit the library. Once he sees all the books, he won't be able to choose just one. He'll check out a giant stack, but then he'll realize he needs a comfy spot to read them. He might build a cozy book fort out of desks and chairs, turning the quiet library into his own reading adventure.

Once he's done reading, he'll probably remember that he never got to be the teacher's helper. He'll grab a dry-erase marker and start writing on the board—except instead of spelling words, he'll draw pictures of cheese. The students will giggle, and the teacher will kindly remind the mouse that spelling words do not include "cheddar" and "Swiss."

Then, the mouse will decide he wants to join a club. He'll race to the art room, where he'll dip his tiny paws into paint and leave colorful prints everywhere! The art teacher will give him a brush, but he'll be too excited to use it. Before anyone can stop him, the mouse will have turned the entire art room into a masterpiece—one big, messy, colorful explosion!

All that running and painting will make the mouse very hungry, so he'll go back to the cafeteria. This time, he won't just eat lunch—he'll want to help cook! He'll put on a chef's hat and start making a sandwich as big as a school desk. He'll pile it high with peanut butter, jelly, bananas, and—of course—cheese!

At the end of the day, when the school bell rings, the mouse will realize he's had the best school day ever. But just as he's about to leave, he'll remember one last thing—his backpack! And if he checks his backpack, he might just find a new idea for another adventure tomorrow!
