Indonesia's Remarkable Biodiversity

Open-Ended Response Answer Key

1. The Sumatran tiger is known for its distinctive dark orange coat with black stripes. It is critically endangered due to habitat loss from deforestation and poaching for its valuable body parts. Conservation efforts are crucial to save this iconic species.
2. The bird-of-paradise is significant in Indonesian culture for its unique appearance and striking plumage. It is important to birdwatchers worldwide due to its exotic beauty and intricate courtship displays, making it a sought-after sighting in the birdwatching community.
3. Deforestation in Indonesia is a major threat to biodiversity as it destroys habitats for countless species. Measures to address this issue include implementing sustainable logging practices, protecting critical habitats, and promoting reforestation and afforestation initiatives.
4. While on a rainforest expedition in Indonesia, I would hope to encounter exotic wildlife such as orangutans, hornbills, and tree kangaroos. I would also be excited to discover unique plant species like giant dipterocarps, rare orchids, and medicinal plants. These encounters would provide valuable insights into the richness of Indonesia's biodiversity and the importance of its conservation.
