The woman introduced herself as Yuki, and she told Yasunari that she had come to repay his kindness. She offered to become his wife and live with him, but she had one condition. Yasunari must never ask her about her true identity or where she came from.

Yasunari agreed, and they were married. With Yuki by his side, his life changed dramatically. Their modest home became filled with warmth and happiness, and Yasunari's fishing nets overflowed with an abundance of fish. They were the envy of the entire village.

Years passed, and the couple grew old together. However, Yasunari's curiosity got the better of him. One day, unable to contain his questions any longer, he asked Yuki about her true form.

A tearful Yuki confessed that she was indeed the crane he had saved all those years ago. She explained that she had used her magical feathers to transform into a human and marry him. Heartbroken by his breach of trust, Yuki returned to her crane form and flew away, leaving Yasunari alone once again.

Despite his regret and sorrow, Yasunari learned a valuable lesson about the consequences of breaking promises and the true meaning of kindness.
