

Name _____

The Water of Life

In a distant kingdom, there was a time when the king fell gravely ill. Despite the best efforts of the royal physicians, his condition worsened by the day. It was rumored throughout the land that the only cure for his ailment was the Water of Life, a magical elixir known for its incredible healing properties.

The Water of Life was said to be found in a distant kingdom, guarded by a formidable dragon. The king's three sons, each eager to save their father, decided to embark on a perilous journey to retrieve the precious elixir.

The eldest prince, named Dimitri, set off first. Along the way, he encountered a dwarf who was trapped beneath a fallen tree. Dimitri chose to help the dwarf, delaying his journey to the Water of Life. In gratitude, the dwarf gifted him a magical golden goose.

The middle prince, named Erik, also encountered the same dwarf while passing the fallen tree. Erik, too, decided to assist the dwarf, and in return, he received a magical golden harp that played enchanting melodies.

The youngest prince, Ivan, arrived at the fallen tree and, like his brothers, chose to help the dwarf. For his kindness, the dwarf gave him a rusty old club.

The brothers continued their journey and eventually reached the kingdom where the Water of Life was said to be located. They confronted the dragon guarding the precious elixir. Dimitri, using the golden goose, distracted the dragon with its shimmering feathers while Erik played the golden harp to soothe the beast.

Ivan, armed only with the rusty club, managed to slay the dragon and obtain the Water of Life. With the elixir in hand, they returned to their kingdom and administered it to their ailing father. The king was miraculously healed, and the kingdom celebrated their triumphant return.

Despite their initial skepticism about Ivan's rusty club, the king praised all three sons for their bravery and resourcefulness. He decided to divide the kingdom into three parts, one for each of his sons to rule, and they lived happily ever after.