School Days: Lessons We Need to Learn

In the halls of learning, where young minds are bound,
I'll speak of the system, where change should be found.

With textbooks thick as bricks and endless tests,
Is this the path where true learning rests?

The classroom's often a sea of monotone,
Where creativity's stifled, and minds have grown cold.

We're taught to memorize and regurgitate,
But where's the room to question and contemplate?

The pressure's immense, with grades as our creed,
But does it truly measure the knowledge we need?

We're more than a letter, a GPA on a chart,
It's time to rethink and make a fresh start.

Let's teach empathy, compassion, and art,
Nurture the passions deep in every heart.

Critical thinking, problem-solving too,
These skills are essential, let's make them come through.

And let's remember, each child's unique,
With talents and dreams that should never be meek.

In the education system, let's create space,
For every young mind to find their own place.

So here's to the future, where change can occur,
In the world of education, let's all concur.

It's time to rewrite the lessons we've known,
And foster young minds to fully have grown.
